Detailed Itinerary:

Day 1 – Arrival in Tehran: First Impressions Count

You arrive at Imam Khomeini International Airport just before sunset. As the sliding doors open, a warm breeze brushes your face — the scent of cardamom and something ancient in the air. A professional driver, holding a sign with your name, welcomes you in English. You're driven in a private car to a modern business hotel in northern Tehran — sleek glass, calm music, Persian tea on arrival.

That night, you dine in Darband, at the foot of the Alborz mountains. You sit on a wooden platform above a stream, wrapped in soft Persian cushions. The sound of water. Grilled kebab. The city lights flicker below.

Day 2 – Morning Meetings, Evening Magic

After a fresh Persian breakfast (walnut jam, feta, herbs, warm bread), you head to your meeting in a glass tower in northern Tehran. Everything runs smoothly — the local team is efficient, respectful, curious. Conversations are deep. Connections real.

But the real surprise is after work. At 6 PM, your guide picks you up and takes you to Golestan Palace. The mirror halls glow in the sunset. You walk past fountains, mosaic tiles, ancient paintings — a silent kingdom inside the chaotic city.

Later, you're invited to a private dinner in a traditional courtyard home. The food? Fragrant. The people? Warm. The music? Live. Persian. Hypnotic. You leave with a full stomach and a heart humming with poetry.

Day 3 – Escape to Kashan: Oasis of Calm

By 8 AM, you're in a private car heading south. The highway slowly shifts into desert. Three hours later, you arrive in Kashan — a small, elegant town on the edge of the central desert. You check into a boutique hotel: thick adobe walls, blue tiles, rosewater in the air.

You wander through Fin Garden, built for kings, watered by ancient qanats. You step into a 500-year-old hammam, where echoes still whisper from the past. Time slows. Mind clears.

That evening, on the hotel's rooftop, you sip hot saffron tea. The sun melts into the sand-colored city. The call to prayer rises, soft and distant.

Day 4 – Return to Tehran, Reconnect & Reflect

After a slow breakfast of pistachios, flatbread, and fresh fruit, you return to Tehran. But this time, you're different — softer, more present. You spend the afternoon in a co-working space near the hotel, catching up on emails with a Persian coffee at your side.

That night, you're taken to a small rooftop café with a view of the mountains. You meet a local entrepreneur over dinner — spontaneous, but inspiring. He tells you, "In Iran, business is about relationships, not just deals." You nod. You understand now.

Day 5 – Departure: A New Kind of Goodbye

Your last morning is light. A final stroll through Tajrish Bazaar, where you buy saffron, handmade notebooks, and a small copper bowl.

Your driver takes you to the airport — this time, the city feels familiar.

You board your flight with more than just contracts.

.You carry stories, tastes, sounds — and a new connection to a place you never expected to love
